

Civil Disobedience and Donald Trump's rise in the polls.

An Note to Pat Buchanan on July 10, 2015

Pat your comments about Civil Disobedience is spot on and ties into your previous article about Donald Trump and the Border wars. These two articles just highlight the dissatisfaction the American people have with their current leaders. What makes the Donald different from the rest of the republican field? He can pretty much say whatever he wants to say. This is because he is not beholden to any special interest group. He is his own special interest group. Is he a patriot? Is he A Crusader for the Common Man? Is he a Savior for the American Way? I think not. He is a business man who is worried about what a progressive takeover of the country would do to his bottom line portfolio. Whatever our new generation of elected officials and campaigners has in style is offset by their lack of an historical prospective on a society, especially the society of the American Experiment. This is not lost on Trump. He knows that the people that work this country want someone to work for them. This nation, which the majority stems from legal immigrants, wants to keep opportunities in the constitution as a privileged right, not a guarantee. This to them is not some rhetoric that is throw out by campaigners that have to read what someone wrote for them, it is fact. And Trump and, as well as, Rand Paul have tapped into their veins of discontent. Us voters that are here because our parents or our grandparents, or our great grandparents came to this country to give us a better life than they had, find that Trump has exactly fulfilled their rational for their voyage across an angry sea to a land of opportunity. To complete the knot of your two articles, a vote for the Donald is flying another flag for Civil Disobedience.